Leadership Track — Video Scripts

All 16 recordings needed across Modules 5–12

How to use this document: Every script below is fully written and ready to read aloud — except one thing. Several scripts ask for a real, specific story from your own life (a level you’d honestly name yourself at, a conversation you delayed, someone you developed). I can’t write those parts for you — they need to actually be true. Wherever you see [YOUR STORY — ...], that’s your cue: a guiding question is included to help you find the story fast, but the words are yours. Everything else is ready to read as written, or adapt in your own voice.

Each script runs to the stated length at a natural, unhurried speaking pace (roughly 130–150 words per minute).

MODULE 5 — Levels & Laws

Intro (3–4 min)

Welcome to Module 5.

Up to this point, this track has been about you — your character, your vision, your inner clarity. This module changes the question. It’s not “who are you becoming.” It’s “how far can that actually carry you.”

Here’s the idea at the center of this module: leadership isn’t one fixed thing you either have or you don’t. It’s a series of levels you climb. Some people rise through those levels for decades. Other people plateau in year two — and never notice they’ve stopped climbing at all.

That second group is the one this module is really written for. Not because they’re bad leaders. Because nobody ever showed them there was a level above the one they were standing on.

[YOUR STORY — Think of someone you watched plateau early, and someone you watched keep climbing for years. What was actually different between them? Tell that contrast briefly here.]

By the end of this module, you’ll know exactly which level you’re operating at with the different people you lead — not the level you’d like to claim, but the honest one — and what specifically moves you to the next.

Let’s get into it.

Closing (2–3 min)

We covered a lot in this module — the five levels, the laws that govern how far your influence actually reaches, what keeps potential from rising.

I want to close with something more personal than a summary.

If I'm honest with myself, I don't operate at the same level with everyone I lead. With some people, I'm still mostly at Position — they follow because of my title, not because I've earned anything deeper yet. With others, I've been at People Development for years.

[YOUR STORY — Name one specific relationship where you'd honestly place yourself at a lower level than you'd like. What's actually kept you there? And name one where you've genuinely reached People Development or further — what did that take?]

That's not something to be ashamed to say out loud. Every leader I respect has relationships at every level, all at once. The question was never "am I always at the top level." It's "do I know which level I'm actually at, honestly, and am I doing anything about it."

Your assignment is next. Go be honest with yourself in it.

MODULE 6 — Building Trust

Intro (3–4 min)

Welcome to Module 6.

Here's something worth noticing before we start: every module before this one has quietly depended on something we haven't actually named yet.

Character only matters if people believe it's real. Vision only moves people if they trust the person casting it. Even the levels from Module 5 — you can't actually reach People Development with someone who doesn't trust you enough to let you develop them.

That thing underneath everything is trust. And this module is where we finally stop assuming it and start building it on purpose.

Trust isn't a personality trait. It's not something you either have with people or don't, based on charisma. It's built through specific, ordinary, repeatable behaviors — and it's just as specifically destroyed by their absence.

[YOUR STORY — Briefly, why does trust matter to you personally as a leader? Is there a moment, even a small one, where you felt what it's like to lead people who genuinely trusted you — versus people who didn't?]

By the end of this module, you'll have a real, practical equation for what trust is actually made of, and four specific behaviors that build it. Let's begin.

Closing (2-3 min)

This module gave you four real behaviors that build trust: saying the real thing, naming the problem everyone's avoiding, fixing mistakes visibly, and keeping the small commitments — the ones that are easy to let slide.

I want to be honest with you about something before we close.

[YOUR STORY — Of those four, which one have you personally had to work hardest at? Not the one that sounds best to say — the real one. What does it actually look like when you fall short of it, and what have you had to do differently?]

I'm telling you that because I think leaders do their people a disservice when we only talk about trust like it's something we've mastered. It's not. It's something we're still building, every week, the same as you.

Take that honesty into your own assignment. Name the behavior you're actually weakest at — not the one that's comfortable to admit.

MODULE 7 — Communication

Intro (3-4 min)

Welcome to Module 7.

Here's the uncomfortable truth this module is built around: everything this track has given you so far only matters if it can actually be communicated.

You can have real character. You can have a vision worth following. You can have genuinely earned trust. And none of it does anything for the people you lead if you can't get it out of your head and into theirs, in a form they can actually receive.

Most communication failures aren't intelligence failures. They're translation failures. You know exactly what you mean. What arrives on the other end isn't always the same thing.

[YOUR STORY — Think of a specific moment you were completely sure you'd communicated something clearly, and later found out the other person heard something totally different. What actually happened?]

This module gives you seven specific principles, nine ways to actually spread a message, and one discipline most leadership training skips entirely: listening. Let's get into it.

Closing (2-3 min)

We covered a lot of ground — the seven principles, the nine channels for spreading a message, and the half of communication most leaders never formally train: actually listening.

I want to close with something that happened to me, not something abstract.

[YOUR STORY — Describe one specific time your own communication genuinely failed to connect — a message you delivered that just didn't land the way you meant it to. What did you learn from watching it not work? Be specific about what you'd do differently now.]

I'm not telling you that story so you feel better about your own failures. I'm telling you because the leaders who actually get better at this aren't the ones who never miss. They're the ones who notice when they've missed, and get curious about why, instead of just moving on.

Take that into your assignment this week.

MODULE 8 — Servant Leadership

Intro (3-4 min)

Welcome to Module 8.

This module inverts almost everything the previous seven modules quietly assumed leadership was for.

Up to now, this track has mostly been about becoming a more effective leader — sharper character, clearer vision, deeper trust, better communication. All of that answers how to lead well. This module asks a different question entirely: effective toward what?

A leader can master every skill in this track and still be building something for themselves the whole time. This module is where we stop and ask honestly whether that's what's actually happening.

There's a simple test at the center of this module, and it's checkable, not just a feeling: are the people you lead actually growing because of you? Or are you growing because of them?

[YOUR STORY — Why does this question matter to you personally? Is there a moment you can remember — maybe uncomfortable — where you realized you were leading for yourself more than you realized?]

Let's find out where you actually stand.

Closing (2-3 min)

This module gave you Greenleaf's test, the ten characteristics of a servant leader, and some real examples of people who took this seriously at very different scales.

I want to answer the test myself, honestly, rather than just teaching it to you.

[YOUR STORY — Apply Greenleaf's actual test to your own leadership right now: are the people you lead growing, becoming healthier and more capable, more likely themselves to serve others? Give a real, honest answer — including where you know the answer isn't yet what you want it to be. Don't perform certainty you don't have.]

That honesty is the actual point of this module. Not having a perfect answer. Having a real one, and being willing to keep asking the question.

Now go answer it for yourself in the assignment.

MODULE 9 — Coaching & Developing People

Intro (3–4 min)

Welcome to Module 9.

This is the module where everything you’ve built in the last eight either starts compounding — or quietly stays capped at whatever you alone can personally produce.

Here’s the math. A leader who only produces results personally is limited to whatever one person, working alone, can do. A leader who genuinely develops other people has already multiplied past anything they could reach on their own.

Training gives someone a skill. Development changes how they see themselves and what they believe they’re capable of. This module is about the second one — the one that actually survives you leaving the room.

[YOUR STORY — Think of someone who genuinely developed you, not just trained you. What did they actually do differently? And think of someone you’re currently developing — where are you honestly stuck with them?]

By the end of this module, you’ll have a real, repeatable process for developing someone else — not just good intentions about it. Let’s begin.

Closing (2–3 min)

We covered the five-step process, three foundational coaching skills, and Paul’s own standard for when development is actually finished — not when someone understands, but when they can teach someone else.

I want to tell you about someone real.

[YOUR STORY — Name someone you personally developed who is now developing someone else — a real fourth generation, even a small one. What did it actually take to get there? Be specific about the investment, not just the outcome.]

That’s the actual finish line this whole module has been pointing toward. Not that you did the work. That the work is still happening without you in the room.

Go find your own version of that in this week’s assignment.

MODULE 10 — Feedback & Managing Performance

Intro (3–4 min)

Welcome to Module 10.

This module is built around one specific thing: the conversation most leaders keep postponing.

You know the one. A piece of direct feedback you've been softening. A performance issue you've been tolerating longer than you should. A pattern everyone can see except, apparently, the person doing it — because nobody's actually told them.

Module 9 was about coaching someone who's genuinely growing. This module is for the harder case: someone who isn't. And it's for the leader who has to finally say something more direct than a question.

[YOUR STORY — Is there a conversation you're currently avoiding right now, today? You don't have to describe the specifics on camera — just be honest with yourself that it exists, and let that honesty come through in how you introduce this module.]

This module gives you real tools for that conversation — a simple feedback model, six questions that can replace a performance review, and a way to tell when coaching has to become something more direct. Let's start.

Closing (2–3 min)

We covered the 3x3 feedback model, six questions that do more work than a formal review, and how to recognize when a conversation has moved from coaching into something that needs a real gap, timeline, and consequence.

I want to be honest about my own track record with this.

[YOUR STORY — Describe one real feedback conversation you personally delayed longer than you should have. What did the delay actually cost — for the other person, or for the team? What would you do differently if you were back at the start of that delay?]

The leaders who get good at this aren't the ones who never avoid a hard conversation. They're the ones who notice they're avoiding it, and shorten the delay next time.

That's your assignment this week — the conversation you've been putting off.

MODULE 11 — Challenge and Celebrate

Intro (3–4 min)

Welcome to Module 11.

This module covers the two practices this track hasn't given you yet — and they've been saved for last on purpose.

Three of the five practices researchers Kouzes and Posner found in genuinely exemplary leaders are already built into modules you've completed: your character work, your vision work, the trust you built by sharing real power rather than just delegating tasks. Two are still missing: challenging the process, and genuinely celebrating the people around you.

Both of these get treated as optional by most leaders. They're not. They're the difference between a team that's comfortable and a team that's actually alive.

[YOUR STORY — Which of these two comes less naturally to you — questioning something that's currently working, or genuinely, specifically celebrating someone else's win? Be honest about which one you personally have to work at.]

Let's get into both.

Closing (2-3 min)

This module gave you two real practices — challenging a process before it breaks, and recognizing people specifically and publicly rather than generically.

Let me tell you about a real time I had to do the first one.

[YOUR STORY — Describe a specific time you challenged a process that genuinely needed challenging — something that was working well enough that nobody else was questioning it. What did it actually cost you to raise it? Were you right? What happened?]

Neither of these practices is comfortable. Questioning what's working feels risky. Celebrating someone publicly takes real planning most of us don't make time for. But leaders who skip both eventually run teams that are either stuck or unseen — sometimes both.

Take one of these two into your assignment this week.

MODULE 12 — Leadership Legacy

Intro (3-4 min)

Welcome to the final module of this track.

Everything we've built together only matters in light of one question, and it's the question this whole module is built around: what happens to all of it once you're no longer the one holding it up?

This isn't really a question about death or retirement. It's much more immediate than that. If you were unexpectedly unavailable next month — a new opportunity, an illness, simply moved on — would what you've built keep standing? Or would it need you specifically to keep existing?

Most leaders never ask that directly, because the honest answer can be uncomfortable. This module asks you to ask it anyway.

[YOUR STORY — Why does this question matter to you personally, right now, at this point in your own leadership? Is there something specific you're currently building that you want to actually outlast you?]

This is the last module. Let's finish it honestly.

Closing (3–4 min)

This is the final video in the entire track, so I want to close with something real rather than a summary.

The question this whole module has been building toward is this: when your leadership season is over, who will be better because you were there?

[YOUR STORY — Give your own honest answer to that question, right now, on camera. Who is actually better because you led them? And just as important — where do you know the answer isn't yet what you want it to be? Name something you're still working to make more true. Don't perform having this all figured out — the leaders watching this need to see that the question stays open even after twelve modules.]

Twelve modules end here. Not because the work is finished — it isn't, for me either — but because you now have everything you need to keep asking these questions on your own, in your own leadership, for as long as you're leading anyone at all.

Thank you for doing this work. Now go build something that outlasts both of us.

A note on recording order

If it helps to record these in a batch rather than one at a time, a natural grouping is:

1. All eight intros together — they share energy and pacing, and doing them back to back keeps your tone consistent.
2. All eight closings together — these are more personal and reflective; recording them in one sitting, in a quieter headspace, will likely produce better takes than mixing them with the higher-energy intros.

Sixteen videos, roughly 45–55 minutes of finished footage total — genuinely doable in two focused recording sessions rather than sixteen separate ones.
